

Johnbeane

Matching the Right Person to the Right Job

Volume 1, Issue 4

Coachin

Conducting the Successful Interview Part 2 in our series "Building a Successful Business One Employee at a Time"

In our last newsletter we ran the first article in our series, "Building a Successful Business One Employee at a Time" in which we discussed how to attract quality candidates to apply for positions with your firm. Following is the next article to help you build the optimum staff, "Conducting the Successful Interview."

Top-notch companies all over the world have discovered the importance of spending time and effort up front when hiring employees to prevent the pain of turnover and termination down the road. Everyone is busy and there never seems to be enough time.

Because of this there is the tendency to get someone, anyone, into an unfilled position as quickly as possible. But if you spend time finding the right people you save time (and money) overall because of the decreased turnover. It turns into a win-win situation for everyone—you get a valuable, long- term employee and the employee is content with his/her new position.

It is extremely important for the interviewer be prepared for the interview. As the interviewer your most important task is to know about the job for which the applicant is applying. Those of you who utilize the John Beane Hiring Report know that our recommendations are based upon matching the character or behavioral tendencies of the prospective employee to what is needed to be successful in a particular job. If you know what character or behavioral tendencies are needed to succeed in a job prior to the interview you can develop a list of open-ended questions that will help you determine if this person's character make-up matches the needs of the job.

Example: You are preparing your questions for an interview. The job requires many hours of overtime and some work on the weekend. Therefore, the applicant must have a strong commitment to work. One of your questions might be, "What would you do if you won a million dollars?" A person with a low work ethic will tend to talk about what vacations they would take or the fun they would have with so much money. A person with a high work ethic would talk of ways to use the money for further achievement. Or you could have them describe their typical day. You would listen for non-productive versus productive activities they pursued to fill their spare time.

Ouestions to determine a person's level of self-esteem are also important. Many of the candidates sent to us have very high self-esteem. This is understandable as these are the people who usually interview well. They appear confident and self-assured giving the interviewer a false sense about them. As the John Beane Hiring Report points out high self-esteem is good but very high self-esteem can make a person hard to manage. A person's selfesteem can be so high that they are delusional about their abilities and deny any personal faults or shortcomings. (Continued)

3840 Echo Farms Blvd. Wilmington, NC 28412

Phone: 910-350-8885 Fax: 910-784-1223

Em ail: jb e ane@ johnb e ane.com

Matching the Right Person to the Right Job

Welcome to these new clients

Crumley & Associates — Asheboro, NC Roberts & Roberts — Tyler, TX Executive Presentations — Los Angeles, CA Herbert Thornbury, Esq. — Chattanooga, TN Walter Clark Legal Group — Palm Desert, CA Chasen & Boscolo — Greenbelt, MD

(continued from page one) If they deny them, then they certainly are not willing to make changes to keep from repeating their mistakes.

When trying to determine a person's self-esteem you might ask them to describe their positive and negative qualities. People with lower self-esteem will easily verbalize their negative qualities. People with moderate to high self-esteem will easily verbalize his or her positive as well as negative qualities. But a person with very high self-esteem will have a very hard time describing any negative qualities.

Following are some things you need to keep in mind during the interview:

1) Keep control of the interview. If the candidate

- talks but gets off track when answering a question (his detail tendency is probably low making it difficult for him to stay focused so make a note of this) steer them back on course.
- Ask every candidate for a particular job the same core questions. This enables you to receive consistent and comparable information between all candidates.
- 3) Use silence to your advantage. Waiting in silence can be awkward for both you and the candidate. But resist the temptation to speak up. You may inadvertently prompt the candidate with clues to the response you want to hear. It

- also gives you an idea how they respond under pressure (make a note about this, especially if the position is one that does place some pressure on the employee.)
- Listen carefully to everything the applicant is saying, take good notes and keep them.
- 5) Always allow plenty of time and privacy for the interview.
- 6) Let the candidate know that you will let them know your decision one way or the other and an approximate timeline in which you plan to do so.

Good Luck!

On the Lighter Side...

Reaching the end of a job interview, the interviewer asked the young lawyer fresh out of Harvard, "And what starting salary were you looking for?"

The lawyer said, "In the neighborhood of $200,000 a year, depending on the benefit's package."

The interviewer said, "Well, what would you say to a package of 5-weeks vacation, 14 paid holidays, full medical and dental, company matching retirement fund to 50% of salary, and a new company car every 2 years, say, a red Corvette?"

The young lawyer sat up straight and said, "Wow!!! Are you kidding?"

And the interviewer said, "Certainly, ...but you started it."